We rounded the corner and Mark stopped, ringing a doorbell next to a nondescript glass door on the first floor of an old building. A red sign with white Chinese characters hung above the door frame, but I saw nothing else to indicate what sort of establishment we were about to enter. I felt a bit nervous about the situation, but didn't want my tour guide to think me ungrateful.

When Jessa Thomson's publisher invited her to Manhattan to put the finishing touches on her latest novel, she was eager to spend some time relaxing and exploring the city. But after three long weeks of battling with her editor, her cover designer and her own inner critic, Jessa is anything but relaxed.

Sensing her frustration, Jessa's editor Mark leads her to a very special massage parlor in Chinatown. Little by little, the very muscular and very talented masseuse Michael works the kinks out of her aching body. But as Michael begins to rub her in all the right places, Jessa feels a new kind of tension building inside her . . . One that only Michael can relieve.
