"Crazy scared Sarah. Are crazy people perceiving alternate realities with some extrasensory perception or are they just crazy with mixed up neurotransmitters? If you let go of what was substantial in daily life, where would you end up? How far down the rabbit hole could you go before you got lost? Sarah knew one thing -- She didn't want to get lost. She wanted to look normal and stay under the radar. Bernie smelled the stale coffee and found herself drawn to old familiar habits. This time she knew she wasn't drinking the coffee, but she reveled in the aromatic molecules, twirling in the air like a dog rolling in some particularly savory cow manure. She became the coffee, toying with the molecules. It was like drinking and digesting but with no need for a cup or a stomach. As she passed through the cookies, the sugar's crystalline structure fascinated her, and she felt angular, but brighter, like a diamond reflecting and magnifying light. She became light as it and she bounced within the sugar crystals. But as she did so, she began to lose her connection with Sarah." The Habitant is volume 1 in the series, The Habitants.
